My dear Prof. Wrong:

I herewith enclose you a typewritten copy of an address recently delivered by me before the National Assembly of Civil Service Commissions in Chicago. To explain this title I would say that there are now a large number of civil service commissions in the United States, some state and some municipal. There is a state commission in Masscahusetts, Illinois, New York and Wisconsin, and municipal commissions in Chicago, New York, Milwaukee, Los Angeles and various other places. Two years ago the different commissions formed a national association which has a meeting biennially. The first meeting was held here in 1906; the second one was held in Chicago last week, and I read the paper on "Results Vs. Theory". I send it to you because it contains some figures and facts which may be of use in your campaign for civil service reform in Canada.

Your favor of the 27th ultimo was duly received by me, and I am glad that you got the various documents which have been sent you in connection with the civil service. If at any time I can help you in any way in your campaign in Canada I shall be glad to do so.

Very truly yours,

Commissioner.

RESULES VS. PRECRY.

I feel it necessary to make two preliminary remarks about this paper. First, what will be estated will be rather trite and probably familiar to a very large proportion of those present. The only encuse for this is that it is difficult to produce new facts or ideas on the subject of civil service reform, and that some of the things I will say may be in the nature of information to some of those present and be useful to them, and will have, therefore, to be received with patience by the rest.

fully would undoubtedly exhaust the patience of this conference.

Results and theory constitute the whole of any subject and to fully discuss the relationship or alleged antagonism between results and theory would necessitate a full discussion of all the aspects of civil service refers. This, of course, is impossible.

Furthermore, there is not and never can be any such antagonism between results and theory as is implied in the title. If the results do not beer out the theory it is not properly speaking a theory at all, but a hypothesis which can never be verified.

In this instance there is no antagonism, properly speaking, between the theory of civil service — referm and its results.

It will therefore be my object briefly to state in the first place the theory upon which the various civil service laws have been based, and a few facts which bear out that theory; and secondly the objections made to the reform and a few of the instances in which these objections have been tested and found to be simply hypothetical, and destitute of any actual force.

The first thought occuring to Jenks, Curtis, and the others who initiated the merit system was undoubtedly to increase the efficiency of the service. It was too manifest in the later sixties that the condition of public service in this country was scandalously inefficient, and that governmental work in the United States was done in a manner inferior to that obtaining in other highly enlightened civilized countries. The thought was to obtain a remedy. It was felt that the first remedy necessary was to fill positions with sole regard to the efficiency of the public service.

opment in the public mind influenced largely the reform movement. It was felt that if the public service was to be advanced it was impossible to have any other consideration in appointments than the public good. An illustration from the rules of law will perhaps be in point. A man to whom money is entrusted for the purposes of investment is allowed by law to make no profit out of it except his compensation in the shape of commission. The courts well know that to allow in the slightest degree any consideration to enter into the investment except the welfare of the owner of the fund will greatly imperil its safety-possibly result in its loss. We have excellent authority for the proposition that "no man can serve two masters". The courts know that the agent who is looking for his own profit cannot adequately safeguard the profit of his clients. So the gradual evolution of ethical standards brought it about that the public conscience realized that the appointing officer ought to have no purpose except the public good? Without question the greatest moral movement that this country has ever som was that which led to the sholition of slavery. It is a notable fact that the early alvocates of civil service reform were persons, like George William Curtie, who had been educated in the school of abolition. These people felt that to allow appointments to be in the alightest degree contributory to the welfare of political parties, except insofar as good appointments would justify the retention in power of a political party, was to allow a breach of trust skin to speculating with the funds of a client.

stitutions like the New York Custon House and the Consuler Service forced these ethical conceptions upon the public mind in the early days of the reform movement.

In seeking for a rule of appointment which would extirpate this cancer in the body politic the mind of reformers was turned towards appointment by means of competition. In his address delivered at Saratoga September 8, 1881, Mr. Curtis said:

"Personal influence in appointments can be annulled only by free and open competition. By that bridge we can return to the practice of Washington and to the intention of the Conestitution. That is the shoe of swiftness and the regic sword by which the Fresident can pierce and outrum the proteam energy of sophistry and tradition which provents him from asserting his power. If you say that success in a competitive literary exemination does not prove fitness to adjust customs duties or to distribute letters or to appraise linen or to measure molasses. I answer that the reform does not propose that fitness shall be proved by a competitive literary examination. It proposes to annul personal influence and political favoritism by making appointment depend upon proved capacity. determine this it proposes first to test the comparative general intelligence of all applicants and their special knowlodge of the particular official duties required, and then to prove the practical faculty of the most intelligent applicents by actual trial in the performance of the duties before they are appointed. If it be still said that success in such a competition may not prove fitness, it is enough to reply that success in obtaining the favor of some kind of boss, which is the present system, presumptively proves unfitness."

There was, however, another important object of this reform so far as the matter of administration was concerned, of a thoroughly practical character. It was the desire for the economical administration of the affairs of the Government. There appointments are made with a sole view to the public welfere no more appointments are made than are necessary to do the public work. The nan who is engaged in grivate business with the cole object of gain does not make two clerks do the work of one, but where appointment are made either from a desire to advance the interests of parties, of fections, or of leaders, or where they are made from notives of sympathy, the natural inpulse is to have an many employees as your appropriation will cover; moreover where political influence controls and a candidate is pushed it is, of course, possible to make mem for the new men in the old brutel nothed of simply turning out some former employee, but that in for the ordinary kind hearted men a very discreeable task, and headles, the man who is turned out has his beckers and there is danger of exciting their antogonism by his recoval. luch the ender and simpler way is to the a now office. This was the method in vogue under the spoils wroten in the metional government prior to 1885. It is still in vogue wherever that ayatem obtains. Destroying entirely any political or personal interest in an appointment as thet interest is destroyed by the establishment of a system of competition it was thought would result in the restriction of appointees to the musher required.

The third object, and by far the most is portant sought to be gained by the merit system, was the destruction of the manine and the system of machine government. All of those was mayo advocated this reform have been therough believers in denocracy and in the possibilities of a desocratic government. There are many communities on the globe at present and there have been may in the past where a democratic government is impossible on socount of the lack of intelligence or sorel character arong the masses of the people, but the founders of civil service reform and those who have advocated the comme since its found tion have nover been convinced that this was time of the Indhed Thatos. They have believed that the people of the saitel states in all of the great crises of its history have ultilately given a righteous judgment between the sout ending questions of policy which have been brought before them for Accision. They have firmly believed that it was perfectly passible by the unbiased exercise of the will of the majority to have an economical, moral and officient government in all of the communities of the country and in the country at large. How for the theory of civil service reform has been exemplified in practice is the question which is now before un. ero the game difficulties in Adersining this mantion that inhere in all political or cools! quertions. The science of government differ in one rement from the natural redemose, for in the letter it is pondible to mise a said declary or collent, wille in the former it is not. For instance, you can exchine two moriod elements and then you can try the ellect upon the two of a third. You know positively that only those two character see in the combination before the third is introbeed, and the objected think follow you know are only night an are council by the third element. But in povemental entrer is is not possible to so the allest of an innovation. it is perticularly diffic it to estimate. It is impossible to tell in dellars and conto the increased value of any one clerk or stemographer from his increased attention to business, and so it is inpossible to tell in every case, in dellars and conto, the improvement of the governmental service by the competitive system. The only thing that can be done is to observe and reason as to that must have been the effect of the change from the old system of appointments to the present one, and then we see that the effect of that along must have been increased efficiency in there. In cannot, for instance, but helicate that the legarizants are better run now then their hands of hepochemic have all that time to attend to administrative work than they were in the coverties when the entire time of each head of legarizants was taken up with appointments. given to nonpolitical administrative work was snatched furtively from the hearings clamored for by the multitude of Congressmen and their applicants for office.

In one Department of the Government, however, there has been kept a very exact account of the efficiency of employees. This is in the railway mail department. This large service is one peculiarly easy to fill by examination. Its duties are of a simple character and ability to discharge the duties of a railway mail clark is easily tested by examination. President Cleveland classified this service just before he left office in 1888, having probably first filled many places therein with Democrats. Mr. Harrison, coming into office, suspended the classification until most of the places were filled by Republicans, and then renewed it. But during the nineteen years which have clapsed since that time there has been a rigid observance of the rules of the merit system so far as appointments to the railway mail service are concerned.

Under the spoils system in 1877, 2500 pieces of mail in the railway mail service were correctly distributed for every one erroneously distributed. In 1889, the service was still under the spoils system, yet there had been during the twelve years preceding an improvement. In 1889, 3,954 pieces were correctly distributed for each error. This was an increase in the number of correct pieces for each error over 1877 of about 16 per cent. In 1889 the merit system was established. In 1900 the number of pieces correctly distributed for each error was 10,175, an increase in the number of correct pieces to each error in eleven years of 254 per cent. Whether under the spoils eyates or union the system of competition some improvement is undoubtedly inherent in any service; but the point to which your attention is called here is that while in twelve years of the spoils system the increase in efficiency was only 55 per cent, in eleven years of the merit system the increase was 254 per cent.

Notice the effect of the application by President Harrison to the railway mail service of the spoils system. In 1889, 3,954 pieces were correctly distributed for each error. In the sarly part of 1893 the service was sacked. The places were distributed on the basis of ability in wire pulling, in place of those svil minded believers in free trade who had previously held then, among persons who believed in the doctrine of the protective tariff. The result was that in the year 1890, when the offices were all filled by new men, the number of pieces correctly distributed decreased from 3,954 to each error to 2,834, a decrease in round numbers of about 50 per cent, or, in other words, an increase in arrors of about thirty per cent. complete demonstration that its theory and its practice correspond that is here given of the effect of the merit system. We have the improvement marked under the merit system. To this the answer was made by the eminent advocate of the spails system in Philadelphia, the present Nayor of Philadelphia, that such improvement would have taken place anyhow. But to this figures furnish the answer. While there would have been some improvement anyhow, the improvement is about five times as great in the same period of time under the merit system as under the application of the doctrines so dear to Senator Marcy, the late Mr. Grosvenor and Mayor Reyborn that to the victor belong the spails. Moreover, the "clean sweep" of 1889 effectually paralyzed progress.

The establishment of a practical system of examinations is one of the things which was believed to be possible by the advocates of civil service reform, and one of the things called for by their theory which its opponents claimed would never be done. In the early days of the Commission there was occasionally some ground for the criticism of the spoilsmen. The English examinations, which are intended to fill a much higher class of offices than any heretofore appointed by examination in this country, were possibly too much followed. The standard was too high. For a time geography was rated as one of the essential elements of the ordinary Departmental clerk examination, and I believe history also. It was soon brought forcibly to the

The propert exemination. therefore, simply applies to the ability of an applicant to read, write and cypher, the arithmetical knowledge called for being less than ought to be required for admission to a high school. It is a striking fact that the assinction given for Departmental elerk is one which ought to be passed by a child with has gone through the eighth grade in any of the larger cities of the country, cortainly in Mashington, but on the other hand it is taken in almost every case by persons who had from one to four years high school experience and in a large number of asses by men who have gone through college, and that yet only 48 per cont of these who take the examination pass it. civil service from politics and of the consequent ab lition of the control of politics by the office-scales or office-scales inchine, the result of the referm in this particular is possibly less apparent and less demonstratable than any of the others. This is largely because it has not been extended as yet to the higher government officials or to the civil corvices of the different states and cities. It is, however, none the less true that much has been accomplished. For instance, the entire competitive force of the government no longer concerns itself with politics. There may be individual exceptions to this rule, but that they are few in number is indicated by the empire me of the livil service consistent. Since June, 1907, the rivil service consistent has had charge at the enforcement of the rule point political sativity in the competitive certics.

be filled by examination; the answer to which is afforded by the spectacle of thousands of Federal officials holding their places through examination and promotion, and discharging the most confidential and responsible duties in the service. In the office of the Civil Service Commission at Washington, for example, of the 170 employees probably $5 per cent have been produced by examination. There is no Department of the Government whose proceedings would be of more interest to the newspapers if revealed and yet I do not believe that in the whole history of the Commission any fact has ever gotten out about its transactions except through the Commissioners. A Government official does not need, in most cases, any confidential employees. Government business is a matter of public interest and the confidential employee or private secretary is much more likely to be manted for purposes of politics than for the doing of the business of the Government. So far as it is necessary to have men who can keep things to themselves and avoid publicity, experience has richly and abundantly demonstrated that they can be gotten by means of examination. It has been repeatedly shown that the man who is appointed by examination and tested by probational appointment is far more reliable, far more honest, and far less likely to be guilty of pecuniary defalcation than the man who has earned his position by services in politics.

It was said that the establishment of a competitive system would deprive us of the inestimable services of political workers, that no one would take any active interest in politics if the services of officials were withdrawn. To this the answer was made and it has been verified by experience, that such activity is only desirable if inspired by seal for promotion or for the success of a worthy candidate, and that the activity which is inspired by the holding or hope of an office might be dispensed with without injury to the body politics

The enormous change involved in the withdrawal of 165,000 or 185,000 classified employees has not apparently put an end to campaigns or created any difficulty in carrying them on. The evil predicted has not followed from the retirement of these people from party activity.

A favorite argument of the advocates of the system of patronage in the past was the superiority of a pass over a competitive examination. We are nearly all familiar with the practice which has shown the futility of the system of pass examinations. From March 3, 1897, to March 3, 1898, 112 persons selected by the patronage system on the principle of a division of patronage between the machines of the different States, took the examination in the State Department for consular positions. Of these 112 only one failed to pass. Mr. Root has characterized these examinations by saying that it was regarded as cruelty to animals to turn anyone down that tried to pass it, and that the standard is so low that no one but a congenital idiot could fail to pass.

Thus it appears that in the instance of the merit system
"wisdom is justified in her children." The application in practice of the theory laid down by the early civil service reformers and so aptly cited by Curtis has shown that all that was claimed of it was true, and all the objections made against it are baseless.

We can but believe, so long as we believe in the progress of society and of human intelligence, that this movement is destined to spread until it has covered every State and municipal service in the Union, and every position in the service of the Government except those in whose choice the political element is also necessary. Before another generation has passed away the changing of postmasters or collectors of customs, or district attornies with every change in the party in power will be as antiquated and as absurd to the eyes of the people of this country as are to us at present the barbarities of the old English common law or the atrocities and absurdities of the system of slavery.
